Levitt & Sons, Inc. v. Commissioner, 5 T.C. 913 (1945)

Payments made by a corporation to settle a dispute related to liabilities of a predecessor company or to discharge obligations of a major stockholder are capital expenditures, not deductible ordinary and necessary business expenses.

Summary

Levitt & Sons, Inc. sought to deduct $65,000 as an ordinary and necessary business expense, arguing it was paid to settle a meritless claim to avoid litigation. The Tax Court denied the deduction. It found the payment was part of a broader settlement resolving disputes among stockholders of a related entity. The court reasoned that Levitt & Sons made the payment either to satisfy a liability of a predecessor corporation or to discharge obligations of its controlling shareholder. As such, the payment constituted either part of the cost of acquiring assets or a distribution to a stockholder, both of which are capital expenditures.

Facts

A group of stockholders in Rockville Centre Corporation (Rockville) disputed certain transactions involving the Levitts. The stockholders, represented by Edelman, alleged improper transfers of Rockville's assets to Abraham Levitt & Sons, Inc. (Abraham Levitt Corp.). Levitt & Sons, Inc. (petitioner) had acquired assets from Abraham Levitt Corp. and assumed its liabilities. Edelman threatened to sue Abraham Levitt, William J. Levitt, Abraham Levitt & Sons, Inc., and potentially the petitioner as a transferee of assets.

Procedural History

The Tax Court initially ruled against the taxpayer. The Circuit Court of Appeals reversed and remanded, directing the Tax Court to make further factual findings regarding the nature of the payment. On remand, the Tax Court received additional evidence, reconsidered the case, and again ruled against Levitt & Sons, Inc., denying the deduction.

Issue(s)

Whether a $65,000 payment made by Levitt & Sons, Inc. to settle a claim related to predecessor companies' liabilities or shareholder obligations constitutes an ordinary and necessary business expense deductible under Section 23(a)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code.

Holding

No, because the payment was either made to satisfy a liability of Abraham Levitt & Sons, Inc., or to discharge obligations of Abraham Levitt, and therefore it was a capital expenditure rather than an ordinary and necessary business expense.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

Court’s Reasoning

The court reasoned that the petitioner failed to prove the payment was an ordinary and necessary business expense. The evidence showed the payment was part of a larger settlement involving multiple parties and issues, primarily concerning adjustments to the assets and liabilities of Babylon Harbor, Inc., and resolving disputes among stockholders of Rockville. The court found that Levitt & Sons was aware of the entire settlement and that the cash payment was not separate from the other parts of the settlement. The court considered the payment either a part of the cost of assets acquired from Abraham Levitt & Sons, Inc., (a capital expenditure), or a distribution to a stockholder (Abraham Levitt). The court emphasized that to be deductible as a business expense, an expenditure must be paid or incurred in carrying on the taxpayer’s business. Here, the controversy stemmed from transactions of other entities before petitioner’s incorporation. As the court stated, “[t]he evidence strongly indicates that the settlement was a settlement made primarily by Abraham Levitt with other stockholders of Babylon and Rockville, and that petitioner was a party to the settlement, again, because it was a transferee of Abraham Levitt & Sons, Inc. Upon all of the evidence, it must be concluded that the controversy did not arise out of any transaction of petitioner in or incidental to its ordinary business.”

Practical Implications

This case clarifies that settlement payments are not automatically deductible as business expenses. Courts will scrutinize the underlying nature of the claim and the reasons for the settlement. Payments related to acquiring assets, settling liabilities of predecessor entities, or benefiting shareholders are generally considered capital expenditures and are not immediately deductible. This case reinforces the principle that a business expense must arise from the taxpayer’s own business activities, not those of related parties or predecessors. It serves as a reminder to carefully document the reasons for settlement payments and to analyze their connection to the taxpayer’s ongoing business operations to support deductibility.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.