

15 T.C. 800 (1950)

Gains from the sale of unharvested crops, even when sold as part of a larger real estate transaction, are taxed as ordinary income, not capital gains, if the crops are considered property held primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of business.

Summary

M. Gladys Watson and her brothers sold their orange grove, including the unharvested orange crop. The IRS determined that the portion of the sale attributable to the oranges should be taxed as ordinary income, not capital gains. The Tax Court agreed, holding that the oranges were property held primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of their business. The court determined the portion of the selling price allocable to the crop and also ruled that a proportional part of the selling expenses could be allocated to the crop sale.

Facts

M. Gladys Watson and her two brothers owned a 115-acre orange grove in California. They operated the grove as a partnership. In 1944, they listed the property for sale. A buyer, Pogue, offered to purchase the ranch because he anticipated a net profit of $120,000 from the orange crop. The sale included the land, trees, and the growing orange crop. The agreement stipulated that the sellers would cover all operating costs until September 1, 1944. Pogue harvested 74,268 boxes of oranges, generating $146,000 in gross proceeds.

Procedural History

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue determined a deficiency in the Watsons' income tax for 1944. Watson contested the deficiency, arguing that the gain from the sale of the orange crop should be treated as a capital gain. The Tax Court reviewed the Commissioner's determination.

Issue(s)

1. Whether a portion of the proceeds from the sale of a citrus grove with unharvested fruit should be allocated to the fruit and treated as ordinary income.
2. If so, what portion of the proceeds should be allocated to the fruit?
3. Whether the expenses of the sale should be allocated between the fruit and the other property sold.

Holding

1. Yes, because the growing crop of oranges was not real property used in the petitioner's trade or business under Section 117(j) of the Internal Revenue

Code, and the crop was property held primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of their business.

2. The portion of the selling price allocable to the growing crop was $40,000.
3. Yes, because a proportional part of the expenses incurred in selling the total properties should be allocated to the crop.

Court's Reasoning

The court reasoned that the crucial question was whether the oranges constituted property held primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of the taxpayer's business. The court emphasized that state law characterization of the oranges as real or personal property was not determinative for federal tax purposes. Quoting Burnet v. Harmel, 287 U.S. 103, the court stated, "The state law creates legal interests, but the Federal statute determines when and how they shall be taxed." The court found that the Watsons were in the business of producing oranges for sale, and the sale of the unharvested crop was an integral part of that business. The court distinguished cases involving the sale of breeding animals or timber, where the primary business was not the sale of those specific assets. The court determined the value of the orange crop based on testimony from both parties' witnesses and allocated a portion of the selling expenses to the crop sale, aligning with the Commissioner's concession on the matter.

Practical Implications

This case clarifies that the sale of unharvested crops can generate ordinary income, even if the sale is part of a larger transaction involving real estate. It highlights the importance of determining whether the asset (here, the unharvested crop) was held primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of the taxpayer's business. Attorneys advising clients on the sale of agricultural property should carefully consider the allocation of the selling price between different assets to accurately reflect the tax consequences. This case informs how similar transactions are analyzed, emphasizing the purpose for which the property is held rather than its characterization under state law. Subsequent cases have cited Watson for its emphasis on the "primarily for sale" test in distinguishing between capital gains and ordinary income.
