23 T.C. 709 (1955)

A loss incurred by a partner from the liquidation of a partnership that transferred its assets to a controlled corporation is not deductible if the partner owns, directly or indirectly, more than 50% of the corporation's stock.

Summary

In 1947, Fritz Busche was a partner in Melba Creamery. The partnership transferred its assets to a newly formed corporation, Melba Creamery, Inc., in which Busche and his family members held a controlling interest. Following the transfer, the partnership dissolved, and Busche claimed a loss on his individual tax return based on the difference between his partnership interest's basis and the amount he received upon liquidation. The Commissioner disallowed the loss, arguing that under Section 24(b)(1)(B) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939, losses from sales or exchanges of property between an individual and a controlled corporation are not deductible. The Tax Court agreed, finding that the substance of the transaction was a sale by Busche to a corporation he controlled, thus barring the deduction.

Facts

Fritz Busche was a partner in Melba Creamery, with an initial 58 1/3% interest. In late 1946 and early 1947, Busche increased his partnership interest. In March 1947, the partnership transferred its assets to Melba Creamery, Inc., a newly formed corporation. Busche, his family members, and a fellow partner, J.H. Von Sprecken, owned all the shares. After the asset transfer, the partnership was liquidated. Busche received cash in the liquidation and claimed a loss on his tax return, which the IRS disallowed.

Procedural History

The Commissioner determined a tax deficiency against Busche, disallowing the claimed loss. The Commissioner later amended his answer to claim an increased deficiency, arguing that the sale of assets and subsequent liquidation were a single transaction where Busche effectively sold his partnership interest to the controlled corporation. The Tax Court considered the case after Busche contested the deficiency.

Issue(s)

1. Whether the loss claimed by Busche upon the liquidation of the partnership was deductible.

2. Whether the transfer of assets from the partnership to the corporation and the subsequent liquidation should be treated as separate transactions.

3. Whether, in applying Section 24(b)(1)(B), the sale of partnership assets should be considered as made by the individual partners or by the partnership entity.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

Holding

1. No, because the loss was disallowed under Section 24(b)(1)(B) of the Internal Revenue Code.

2. No, because the court viewed the transaction as a single sale of partnership assets to a controlled corporation.

3. The sale of partnership assets was considered as made by the individual partners, not by the partnership entity, for purposes of applying Section 24(b)(1)(B).

Court's Reasoning

The court focused on the substance of the transaction, disregarding its form. The court determined that, even though the transaction involved multiple steps, the end result was a sale from Busche to a corporation he controlled. The court noted that Section 24(b)(1)(B) of the Internal Revenue Code was designed to prevent tax avoidance by disallowing loss deductions on transactions between related parties where there is no real economic change. The court cited the legislative history of the provision, emphasizing its intent to prevent the artificial creation of losses. The court rejected the argument that the sale was made by the partnership as an entity separate from the individual partners, holding that for purposes of applying Section 24(b)(1)(B), the actions of the partnership should be attributed to its partners.

The court considered the series of events as a single transaction and found that to allow the loss would be contrary to the statute. The court quoted from Commissioner v. Whitney (C.A. 2, 1948), emphasizing that the loss disallowance aims at situations where there's no real change in economic interest, and the termination of the partnership does not change the application of the rule.

A dissenting opinion argued that the Commissioner's determination recognized that the liquidation loss was ordinary and challenged the increased deficiency which was based on a mischaracterization of the transaction. The dissent contended the majority confused the issue by focusing on the sale of assets when the claimed loss arose from the liquidation.

Practical Implications

This case is critical for understanding how courts will treat transactions between partners and their controlled corporations. The decision reinforces that courts will look beyond the form of a transaction to its substance to prevent tax avoidance. Taxpayers should structure transactions to avoid the appearance of related-party dealings, which can trigger disallowance of loss deductions. The case highlights the importance of careful planning when a business is transferred from a partnership to a corporation where the partners will maintain control. A taxpayer is barred from deducting a loss if he or she directly or indirectly owns more than 50% of a corporation’s outstanding stock. Later cases dealing with related party transactions continue to cite Busche, solidifying its principles. The key takeaway for legal practice is to carefully analyze ownership structures and transaction steps to determine if related-party rules apply to prevent loss deductions.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.