Johnson v. Commissioner, 18 T.C. 510 (1952)

Income is not constructively received if there are substantial limitations or restrictions on the taxpayer's ability to access the funds, even if the funds are credited to their account.

Summary

The case concerns the doctrine of constructive receipt and whether salary credited to an employee's account but not paid in the tax year was taxable income. The court determined that the salary was not constructively received because there was an oral agreement among the company's officers that the salary checks would not be cashed until the company president authorized it, due to the company's financial situation. The court focused on whether the taxpayer had unrestricted control over the funds and found that the restriction constituted a substantial limitation, thus preventing the application of the constructive receipt doctrine. The decision emphasizes that the ability to access funds, rather than the mere availability, is key.

Facts

The taxpayer, Johnson, was an officer and shareholder of Dartmont Coal Company. In 1949, Dartmont credited $2,951.10 to Johnson's salary account but did not pay it in cash that year. The company had insufficient cash to pay all salaries. The company's president agreed with the other officers that the salary checks would not be presented for payment until the president authorized it. The IRS argued that the salary was constructively received by Johnson because the corporation had enough assets to pay it.

Procedural History

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue determined that the credited salary was constructively received income for the 1949 tax year. The taxpayer challenged this determination in the Tax Court.

Issue(s)

1. Whether the credited salary of $2,951.10 was constructively received income in 1949, despite not being paid.

Holding

1. No, because there was a substantial limitation on the taxpayer's ability to access the funds.

Court's Reasoning

The court applied the doctrine of constructive receipt, which holds that income is taxable when it is unconditionally subject to the taxpayer's demand, even if not actually received. The court cited Section 29.42-2 of Regulations 111, which states that the income must be credited or set apart without substantial limitation or restriction as to the time, manner of payment, or conditions upon which payment is made. The court emphasized that the taxpayer must have the ability to draw the money at any time and bring its receipt within their control and disposition.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

The court found that there was a substantial limitation because of the agreement among the officers that the checks would not be cashed until the president authorized it. The court found that the amount was not unequivocally subject to his demand and disposition. The court stated, "it is essential for us to determine whether the amount credited to petitioner's account was unequivocally made subject to his demand and disposition without any substantial limitation thereon during the taxable year."

The court rejected the Commissioner's argument that the corporation's available funds on certain days meant the salary was constructively received. The court considered the corporation's overall financial position, including its liabilities and other outstanding obligations, concluding that the restriction on payment was valid. The court considered the corporation's cash on hand, and the fact that there was not enough cash to pay the full amount of accrued salaries, as well as other outstanding obligations. The court also considered the financial difficulties of Dartmont at the time, as demonstrated by the fact that the salary checks were restricted and large loans had to be taken out.

The court distinguished the case from situations where a corporation has the ability to pay but chooses not to. In this case, the condition restricting payment was mutually agreed upon by all the involved parties.

Practical Implications

This case provides clear guidance on the application of the constructive receipt doctrine. It is crucial to assess whether there were substantial limitations on the taxpayer's access to the funds. Even if the funds are available in a technical sense, restrictions based on financial needs or agreements among parties can prevent constructive receipt. This case emphasizes the importance of understanding the taxpayer's control over the income. In situations involving closely held corporations, it is crucial to document any limitations on the distribution of income. Tax professionals need to examine the entire financial picture, including the company's cash flow and liabilities to determine if the taxpayer had the ability to draw upon the credited funds. This case is frequently cited in constructive receipt cases.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.