Romine v. Commissioner, 25 T.C. 873 (1956)

Income is constructively received by a cash-basis taxpayer when it is unqualifiedly available to them, even if not actually received, and the taxpayer's control over the timing of receipt determines the year of taxation.

Summary

The case involves a farmer who sold livestock in late 1946 but received payment in early 1947. The Commissioner asserted a deficiency, arguing the income was constructively received in 1946, and the Tax Court agreed. The court analyzed the doctrine of constructive receipt, focusing on the taxpayer's control over the availability of the funds. The court held the income was taxable in 1946 because the purchaser was ready and able to pay, and the taxpayer's delay in collecting was due to his own actions. The ruling underscores the principle that taxpayers cannot control the timing of their tax liability by delaying the actual receipt of funds when those funds are readily available.

Facts

The taxpayer, a farmer, used the cash method of accounting. He sold hogs to a company on December 30, 1946. The hogs were delivered by a commercial trucker. The taxpayer typically collected payment in person but did not seek payment on December 30 or 31, 1946. He collected a check from the company on January 2, 1947. The company recorded the transaction in its books as of December 30, 1946, and reported the payment on its 1946 tax return. The taxpayer reported the income on his 1947 return.

Procedural History

The Commissioner determined a deficiency, asserting the income was constructively received in 1946. The taxpayer contested this in the Tax Court.

Issue(s)

1. Whether the assessment of deficiencies for the years 1945 and 1946 was barred by the statute of limitations.

2. Whether the taxpayer constructively received income from the sale of livestock in 1946, even though actual receipt was in 1947.

3. Whether the taxpayer could deduct, as a farm expense, the value of corn given to him by his parents.

Holding

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

1. No, because the statute of limitations was extended by signed waivers.

2. Yes, because the income was constructively received in 1946, and thus taxable in that year.

3. No, because the taxpayer's basis in the corn was zero.

Court's Reasoning

The court first addressed the statute of limitations and upheld the validity of the waivers extending the assessment period. Regarding constructive receipt, the court relied on Treasury Regulations and prior case law. The court cited Regs. 111, sec. 29.42-2, which states that income is constructively received when it is unqualifiedly available and subject to the demand of a cash basis taxpayer. The court reasoned that the company was both willing and able to pay the taxpayer on December 30, 1946. The taxpayer had complete control over when he collected the payment. The court distinguished the case from scenarios where third parties or corporate policies prevented immediate payment.

The court then found that the corn given to the taxpayer by his parents was not deductible. The court determined that the parents had no taxable income from giving the corn, so the taxpayer also had a zero basis and no deduction was allowed.

Practical Implications

This case highlights the importance of understanding constructive receipt for cash-basis taxpayers, especially at year-end. Legal practitioners should advise clients to be mindful of when income becomes unconditionally available. Taxpayers cannot simply postpone income recognition by delaying collection, if they have the ability to collect it. This case also reinforces the rule that the timing of deductions can be influenced by how assets are acquired. Tax advisors should carefully evaluate the basis of assets and their impact on the tax implications of gifting assets.

Later cases have applied or distinguished this ruling in situations involving deferred compensation, dividend payments, and other forms of income. The case is frequently cited for its clear articulation of the constructive receipt doctrine. It impacts how similar cases are analyzed, particularly when the taxpayer could have controlled the time of payment. Business practices in this area include ensuring that all necessary actions are taken by year-end to manage the timing of income receipts to align with desired tax outcomes. If a payment is delayed for a valid business reason (and not simply for tax planning), it may not be deemed constructively received.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved. 