Estate of H.H. Timken, Jr. v. Commissioner, 18 T.C. 465 (1952)

For a cash basis taxpayer, income is not recognized until cash or its equivalent is actually or constructively received; a mere promise to pay, even if evidenced by an open account, is not considered income until the taxpayer has control and command over the funds.

Summary

The Tax Court addressed whether a cash basis taxpayer constructively received income from a stock sale where the proceeds were contractually obligated to be reinvested in the company. H.H. Timken Jr. sold stock in New Sutherland Divide Mining Company but, as a condition of the sale, agreed that the proceeds would be directly transmitted to New Sutherland as an investment. The court held that Timken, a cash basis taxpayer, did not constructively receive income in the year of the sale because he never had unfettered control over the funds. The court also determined that a subsequent loss related to the investment was a capital loss, not an ordinary business loss.

Facts

Decedent H.H. Timken Jr. was a lawyer who received stock in New Sutherland Divide Mining Company as a legal fee.

Timken and other shareholders agreed to sell a portion of their stock.

As a condition of the sale, Timken and the other vendors were required to agree that the sale proceeds would be transmitted directly to New Sutherland and treated as a further investment in the company.

Timken reported his taxes on a cash basis.

In 1948, $1,000 was credited to Timken’s capital account at his law firm but not reported as income.

Timken later experienced a loss related to his investment in New Sutherland.

Procedural History

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue determined a deficiency in Timken’s income tax for 1948, arguing that the $1,000 and the stock sale proceeds were taxable income and that the loss was not fully deductible.

The Tax Court reviewed the Commissioner’s determination.

Issue(s)

1. Whether the $1,000 credited to decedent’s capital account in his law firm constituted taxable income in 1948.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

2. Whether the proceeds from the sale of stock in New Sutherland Divide Mining Company were constructively received by the decedent in 1948, despite being contractually obligated to be reinvested in the company.

3. Whether the loss incurred by the decedent in New Sutherland was an ordinary loss deductible in full, or a capital loss subject to limitations.

Holding

1. Yes. The deficiency related to the $1,000 credit to the capital account was sustained because there was no evidence presented to support the claim that it was a trust fund and not income.

2. No. The proceeds from the stock sale were not constructively received in 1948 because the decedent did not have unfettered control over the funds; they were contractually obligated to be reinvested.

3. The loss was a capital loss because it was not incurred in the decedent's trade or business as a promoter or in a joint venture, but rather as an investment related to stock initially received as a legal fee.

Court's Reasoning

Regarding the stock sale proceeds, the court reasoned that for a cash basis taxpayer, income is recognized when actually or constructively received. Constructive receipt occurs when income is available to the taxpayer without substantial limitation or restriction. The court emphasized that Timken was contractually bound to have the proceeds reinvested; he never had the option to receive cash personally. The court stated, "To a cash basis taxpayer, that is not income until the debt is collected… And once the contract was made, decedent was effectively disabled from receiving, for the stock, cash or its equivalent or any consideration other than an account receivable. He was never a free agent as to collecting the proceeds." The court distinguished constructive receipt from a mere promise to pay, noting that an open account receivable is not the equivalent of cash for a cash basis taxpayer. Citing John B. Atkins et al., 9 B. T. A. 140, 149, the court highlighted, "So far as we have been able to ascertain, a promise to pay evidenced solely by an open account has never been regarded as income to one reporting on a cash basis by the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Certainly this is true in the absence of any showing that the amount was immediately available to the taxpayer."

Regarding the loss, the court rejected the petitioner's arguments that it was an ordinary loss because Timken was a professional promoter or engaged in a joint venture. The court found no evidence that Timken was in the business of corporate financing or promotion. His involvement with New Sutherland originated from receiving stock as a legal fee, and his subsequent actions were aimed at maximizing the value of that fee, not in the course of a promotion business. The court concluded the loss was a capital loss related to an investment, not a business debt or loss.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

Practical Implications

This case reinforces the fundamental principles of cash basis accounting, particularly the doctrine of constructive receipt. It clarifies that for income to be constructively received, the taxpayer must have an unqualified right to demand and receive it. Contractual restrictions that prevent a taxpayer from accessing funds in the year of a transaction preclude constructive receipt, even if the taxpayer is entitled to receive something of value (like an account receivable). This case is frequently cited in tax law for its clear articulation of the constructive receipt doctrine as it applies to cash basis taxpayers and highlights the importance of control and access to funds in determining when income is recognized. It also illustrates the distinction between capital losses and ordinary business losses in the context of investment activities versus business operations.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.