Estate of James H. Lumpkin, Jr. , Deceased, Christine T. Hamilton, Executrix, Petitioner v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Respondent, 56 T. C. 815 (1971)

An employee does not possess incidents of ownership in a group life insurance policy if their only substantive right is to select an optional mode of settlement for payments to a beneficiary.

Summary

The Estate of Lumpkin case addressed whether the proceeds from a group life insurance policy should be included in the decedent's estate under IRC section 2042. The policy, entirely employer-funded and with fixed beneficiary classes, allowed the decedent only to choose an optional settlement mode for payments to his spouse. The court ruled that this limited right did not constitute an incident of ownership, as it did not allow control over the economic benefits of the policy or the power to dispose of the proceeds. The decision clarified that the power to terminate employment, the lack of a conversion privilege under Delaware law, and the ability to assign rights under the policy did not amount to incidents of ownership.

Facts

James H. Lumpkin, Jr. , an employee of Humble Oil & Refining Co. , was covered by a group term life insurance policy paid for entirely by Humble. The policy specified that benefits would be paid to designated classes of preference relatives upon the employee's death. Lumpkin's only substantive right under the policy was to select an optional mode of settlement, which allowed him to adjust the timing of payments to his spouse. The policy was governed by Delaware law and did not include a conversion privilege to an individual policy upon termination of employment.

Procedural History

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue determined a deficiency in the estate's federal estate tax, asserting that Lumpkin possessed incidents of ownership in the group life insurance policy. The Estate of Lumpkin contested this determination in the United States Tax Court, which held that Lumpkin did not possess any incidents of ownership under the policy.

Issue(s)

1. Whether the decedent's ability to select an optional mode of settlement for payments to his spouse constituted an incident of ownership under IRC section 2042.
2. Whether the decedent's power to cancel the insurance coverage by quitting his job was an incident of ownership.
3. Whether the decedent's potential conversion privilege under Texas or New York law constituted an incident of ownership.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

4. Whether the decedent’s ability to assign his rights under the policy was an incident of ownership.

Holding

1. No, because the ability to select the settlement mode was limited and did not confer control over the economic benefits of the policy or the power to dispose of the proceeds.
2. No, because the power to terminate employment is not considered an incident of ownership in the context of group insurance policies.
3. No, because the policy was governed by Delaware law, which did not require a conversion privilege, and the Texas and New York statutes did not apply.
4. No, because the only substantive right assignable was the limited settlement mode selection, which was not an incident of ownership.

Court’s Reasoning

The court applied IRC section 2042, which requires the inclusion of insurance proceeds in the gross estate if the decedent possessed incidents of ownership. The court interpreted incidents of ownership as rights that confer control over the economic benefits of the policy or the power to dispose of property. The decedent’s ability to select an optional mode of settlement was deemed too limited to meet this criterion, as it only affected the timing of payments to his spouse and did not alter the beneficiaries or the total amount payable. The court also rejected the Commissioner’s arguments that the power to terminate employment or potential conversion privileges under Texas or New York law constituted incidents of ownership, citing Delaware law’s governance over the policy and established case law. The court emphasized that the power to assign rights under the policy was not an incident of ownership if the rights assigned did not themselves constitute incidents of ownership.

Practical Implications

This decision clarifies that limited rights to adjust the timing of payments under a group life insurance policy do not constitute incidents of ownership for estate tax purposes. It informs legal practitioners that the mere power to terminate employment does not create taxable incidents of ownership in group policies. Additionally, the ruling highlights the importance of the governing law specified in the policy, which may override statutory conversion privileges in other states. This case impacts how estate planners and tax professionals assess the tax implications of group life insurance policies, emphasizing the need to focus on substantive rights that confer control over the policy’s economic benefits. Subsequent cases, such as Landorf v. United States and Kramer v. United States, have reinforced these principles.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.