

Burnstein v. Commissioner, 66 T. C. 492 (1976)

Educational expenses that qualify a taxpayer for a new trade or business are not deductible as ordinary and necessary business expenses.

Summary

Muriel Burnstein, a special education teacher, sought to deduct expenses incurred in obtaining a Master of Social Work (M. S. W. ) degree. The IRS disallowed the deduction, arguing that the education led to qualifying her for a new trade or business. The U. S. Tax Court upheld the IRS's decision, ruling that the M. S. W. degree enabled Burnstein to enter the profession of social work, which was considered a new trade or business. The court emphasized that the objective effect of the education, rather than the taxpayer's subjective intent, determines deductibility under Section 162(a) of the Internal Revenue Code and the corresponding regulations.

Facts

Muriel Burnstein held a Master of Education degree and worked as a special education teacher at Variety Children's Home, focusing on dyslexic children and counseling their parents. In 1970, she resigned from this position to pursue an M. S. W. degree at Tulane University. After receiving her M. S. W. in 1971, she served a postgraduate internship and subsequently worked as a social worker at Touro Infirmary Mental Health Center, where an M. S. W. was a minimum requirement. She later started a private practice in psychiatric social work. Burnstein attempted to deduct $2,930 in educational expenses related to her M. S. W. on her 1971 tax return.

Procedural History

The IRS disallowed the deduction and determined a deficiency of $1,728. 70 in Burnstein's 1971 income tax. Burnstein petitioned the U. S. Tax Court to challenge the IRS's determination. The Tax Court heard the case and issued a decision upholding the IRS's disallowance of the deduction.

Issue(s)

1. Whether the educational expenses incurred by Muriel Burnstein in obtaining her M. S. W. degree were deductible under Section 162(a) of the Internal Revenue Code as ordinary and necessary business expenses.

Holding

1. No, because the education led to qualifying Burnstein in a new trade or business, namely social work, which is not deductible under Section 162(a) and the corresponding regulations.

Court's Reasoning

The court applied Section 162(a) of the Internal Revenue Code and the regulations under Section 1. 162-5, which state that educational expenses are deductible only if they do not lead to qualifying the taxpayer in a new trade or business. The court found that social work is a recognized profession and that the M. S. W. degree qualified Burnstein to enter this profession. The court emphasized the objective nature of the test, stating that the taxpayer's subjective intent is irrelevant. Expert testimony and Burnstein's subsequent employment as a social worker, which required the M. S. W. degree, supported the court's conclusion. The court cited previous cases like Bodley and O'Donnell to reinforce the objective standard applied in determining the deductibility of educational expenses.

Practical Implications

This decision clarifies that educational expenses leading to qualification in a new trade or business are not deductible, regardless of the taxpayer's intent or continued work in their previous field. Legal practitioners advising clients on tax deductions should ensure that educational pursuits are directly related to maintaining or improving skills in an existing trade or business, not entering a new one. The ruling impacts how taxpayers and their advisors approach the deductibility of educational expenses, emphasizing the need for careful consideration of the objective effect of the education. Subsequent cases, such as Weiszmann v. Commissioner, have reaffirmed this principle, further solidifying its impact on tax practice.
