Webb v. Commissioner, 67 T. C. 293 (1976)

A subsidiary's purchase of its parent corporation's stock from a shareholder does not result in a taxable dividend to the parent corporation under I. R. C. § 304(a)(2) and (b)(2)(B).

Summary

In Webb v. Commissioner, the Tax Court addressed whether a subsidiary's purchase of its parent's stock from a shareholder resulted in a taxable dividend to the parent. The court held that no such dividend was realized by the parent corporation, Cecil M. Webb Holding Co. , when its subsidiary, Kinchafoonee, purchased stock from the estate of Cecil Webb. The court reasoned that I. R. C. § 304(a)(2) and (b)(2)(B) treat the transaction as a redemption by the parent for tax purposes to the shareholder, not as a dividend to the parent itself. This ruling prevented the imposition of income and personal holding company taxes on the parent and shielded former shareholders from transferee liability.

Facts

In 1963, Cecil M. Webb formed the Cecil M. Webb Holding Co. (Webb Co.), which owned majority stakes in various companies known as the Dixie Lily group. Upon Cecil's death in 1965, his estate included significant shares of Webb Co. In 1967, to pay estate taxes and expenses, the estate sold 515,900 shares of Webb Co. to Kinchafoonee, a subsidiary, for $288,904. Webb Co. was later liquidated in 1971, distributing its assets to shareholders. The Commissioner argued that this transaction resulted in a taxable dividend to Webb Co. , triggering income and personal holding company taxes, and sought to impose transferee liability on the former shareholders.

Procedural History

The Commissioner determined deficiencies in Webb Co. 's 1967 federal income tax and sought to hold the former shareholders liable as transferees. The petitioners, former shareholders of Webb Co. , challenged this determination before the United States Tax Court.

Issue(s)

1. Whether the proceeds of the sale of Webb Co. 's stock to Kinchafoonee are taxable to Webb Co. as a dividend under I. R. C. § 304(a)(2) and (b)(2)(B)?

2. If so, whether Webb Co. 's failure to report such dividend income was an omission of a sum in excess of 25% of the gross income reported, triggering the 6-year statute of limitations under I. R. C. § 6501(e)?

3. If so, whether the receipt of the dividend caused Webb Co. to become a personal holding company subject to the tax under I. R. C. § 541?

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

4. If so, whether Webb Co. is allowed a dividends-paid deduction under I. R. C. §§ 561 and 562 in computing its personal holding company tax?

5. Whether the petitioners are liable as transferees for any deficiencies owed by Webb Co. for 1967?

Holding

1. No, because I. R. C. § 304(a)(2) and (b)(2)(B) treat the transaction as a redemption by Webb Co. for tax purposes to the shareholder, not as a dividend to Webb Co. itself.

2. No, because there was no dividend income to omit, and thus the 3-year statute of limitations under I. R. C. § 6501(a) applies.

3. No, because without the dividend income, Webb Co. did not become a personal holding company.

4. No, because the issue of the dividends-paid deduction is moot given the absence of personal holding company status.

5. No, because without any tax deficiency due from Webb Co. , there is no basis for transferee liability against the petitioners.

Court’s Reasoning

The court focused on the legislative intent and text of I. R. C. § 304(a)(2) and (b)(2)(B), which were enacted to close a loophole identified in Rodman Wanamaker Trust. These sections treat a subsidiary’s purchase of its parent’s stock as a redemption by the parent for tax purposes to the selling shareholder, not as a dividend to the parent. The court emphasized that the language and legislative history support the view that the transaction’s tax consequences are limited to the shareholder level, not the corporate level of the parent. The court rejected the Commissioner’s argument that the transaction resulted in a “constructive” dividend to the parent, stating that Webb Co. received no economic benefit from the transaction. The court also overruled prior decisions that suggested a taxable dividend to the parent in similar situations, finding them inconsistent with the statutory scheme. Judge Scott dissented, arguing that the transaction should be treated as a distribution by the subsidiary to the parent, resulting in a taxable dividend to the parent.

Practical Implications

This decision clarifies that a subsidiary’s purchase of its parent’s stock does not generate taxable income for the parent under I. R. C. § 304(a)(2) and (b)(2)(B).

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

Practitioners advising on corporate transactions involving stock purchases by subsidiaries should focus on the tax implications to the selling shareholder rather than the parent corporation. This ruling may encourage the use of such transactions for estate planning purposes, as it allows estates to sell stock to subsidiaries without triggering additional corporate taxes. However, it also underscores the need to carefully consider the broader tax implications, including potential personal holding company tax issues, which were not applicable in this case but could be in others. The decision also impacts how the IRS assesses transferee liability, as former shareholders cannot be held liable for taxes that were never due to the parent corporation. Subsequent cases have generally followed this interpretation, reinforcing its impact on tax planning and compliance in corporate structures involving parent-subsidiary relationships.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.