

German v. Commissioner, 72 T. C. 720 (1979)

A taxpayer cannot use extrinsic evidence to contradict a legible private postage meter postmark indicating that a Tax Court petition was filed late.

Summary

In German v. Commissioner, the Tax Court addressed whether a taxpayer could use extrinsic evidence to contradict a private postage meter postmark on a petition filed with the court. The taxpayer, German, received a notice of deficiency from the IRS and had 90 days to file a petition. The petition was received by the court on the 95th day, with a private postage meter postmark dated the 91st day. German argued the meter was set incorrectly, and he should be allowed to prove the petition was actually mailed on time. The court held that a legible private postage meter postmark is conclusive evidence of the mailing date and cannot be contradicted by extrinsic evidence if it shows the petition was filed late. This ruling upholds the strict 90-day filing requirement for Tax Court petitions.

Facts

The IRS determined income tax deficiencies for German for 1972 and 1973 and mailed a statutory notice of deficiency on August 19, 1977. German had 90 days to file a petition with the Tax Court. He mailed the petition using a private postage meter, which postmarked the envelope on November 18, 1977, the 91st day after the notice. The petition was received by the court on November 22, 1977, the 95th day. German claimed the postage meter was set incorrectly to November 18 when he mailed it on November 17, the 90th day, and sought to present extrinsic evidence to prove this.

Procedural History

The Commissioner filed a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, arguing German's petition was not filed within the statutory 90-day period. The Tax Court considered whether the private postage meter postmark could be contradicted by extrinsic evidence.

Issue(s)

1. Whether a taxpayer can use extrinsic evidence to contradict a legible private postage meter postmark that indicates a Tax Court petition was filed after the 90-day statutory period?

Holding

1. No, because the court found that a legible private postage meter postmark is conclusive evidence of the mailing date and cannot be contradicted by extrinsic evidence if it shows the petition was filed late.

Court's Reasoning

The court reasoned that the purpose of section 7502 and its regulations is to provide tangible evidence of mailing, avoiding the need for testimony about the mailing date. When a legible postmark from the U. S. Postal Service is present, no contradictory evidence is allowed. Similarly, for private postage meter postmarks, the court emphasized that the regulations allow extrinsic evidence only when the postmark date is timely. In this case, the postmark was legible and dated after the 90-day period, thus precluding any extrinsic evidence to the contrary. The court noted that allowing such evidence would undermine the parity between private and Postal Service postmarks and the strict 90-day filing requirement set by Congress. The court cited previous cases like Lindemood v. Commissioner and Shipley v. Commissioner to support its position that a legible postmark is conclusive.

Practical Implications

This decision reinforces the strict enforcement of the 90-day filing deadline for Tax Court petitions. Taxpayers must ensure that their petitions are postmarked by the U. S. Postal Service or a private meter on or before the 90th day. If using a private meter, the postmark date is final and cannot be challenged with extrinsic evidence if it falls after the deadline. This ruling affects legal practice by requiring attorneys to be vigilant about timely filing and to use reliable mailing methods. It also impacts taxpayers by limiting their ability to contest late filings based on alleged errors in private postage meter settings. Subsequent cases have followed this precedent, maintaining the strict interpretation of the filing deadline.
