Rosen v. Commissioner, 71 T. C. 226 (1978)

The tax benefit rule requires taxpayers to include in gross income the fair market value of property returned to them after being donated and deducted as a charitable contribution.

Summary

In Rosen v. Commissioner, the Rosens donated property to charities in 1972 and 1973, claiming charitable deductions, but the properties were returned to them in subsequent years without consideration. The Tax Court held that the Rosens must include the fair market value of the returned properties in their gross income under the tax benefit rule, as the returns were not gifts but rather attempts to reverse the original donations. The decision underscores the broad application of the tax benefit rule, even when the property's return is not legally obligated, and establishes that subsequent costs related to the returned property do not reduce the includable income.

Facts

In 1972, the Rosens donated a property valued at $51,250 to the City of Fall River, claiming a charitable contribution deduction. In April 1973, the city returned the property to them without consideration due to internal disputes over its use. In June 1973, the Rosens donated the same property, now valued at $48,000, to Union Hospital, again claiming a deduction. By August 1974, the hospital, facing financial difficulties and property deterioration, returned the property, now valued at $25,000, to the Rosens. The Rosens incurred $5,000 in demolition costs after receiving the property back from the hospital.

Procedural History

The Commissioner determined deficiencies in the Rosens' 1973 and 1974 income taxes, asserting that the fair market value of the returned properties should be included in their gross income. The Rosens contested this, leading to a case before the United States Tax Court, which was submitted on a stipulation of facts without a trial.

Issue(s)

1. Whether the return of donated property to the taxpayer, without legal obligation, constitutes a taxable event under the tax benefit rule.
2. Whether the fair market value of the returned property at the time of its return must be included in the taxpayer's gross income.
3. Whether subsequent demolition costs can reduce the amount of income to be included from the returned property.

Holding

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

1. Yes, because the tax benefit rule applies broadly to any recovery of an item previously deducted, and the intent to reverse the original gift transaction was clear.
2. Yes, because the tax benefit rule requires inclusion of the fair market value of the returned property in the year of recovery, which in this case was stipulated to be $51,250 in 1973 and $25,000 in 1974.
3. No, because the demolition costs were incurred after the property was returned and are not deductible against the fair market value at the time of return.

Court's Reasoning

The Tax Court applied the tax benefit rule, which requires inclusion in gross income of any recovery of an item previously deducted, to the Rosens' situation. The court rejected the Rosens' argument that the returns were gifts under IRC § 102(a), citing Commissioner v. Duberstein's criteria for gifts, which require detached and disinterested generosity. The court found that the city and hospital returned the property out of a desire to undo the original donations, not out of generosity. The court also established that a legal obligation to return the property is not necessary for the tax benefit rule to apply; the intent to reverse the original transaction is sufficient. The court further clarified that the fair market value at the time of return, not the value at the time of the original donation, is the amount to be included in income, and subsequent costs like demolition do not reduce this amount.

Practical Implications

This decision reinforces the application of the tax benefit rule in cases of returned charitable contributions, even when there is no legal obligation to return the property. Practitioners should advise clients to consider the potential tax implications of donating property that may be returned, as the fair market value at the time of return must be included in income. This ruling also clarifies that subsequent costs related to the returned property do not offset the income inclusion, which is important for planning purposes. The case serves as a precedent for similar situations where property is returned to a donor after a charitable deduction has been claimed, and it may influence how taxpayers and charities structure such transactions to avoid unintended tax consequences.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.