Tilford v. Commissioner, 75 T. C. 134 (1980)

A shareholder's transfer of stock to employees in exchange for services is treated as a sale or exchange, not a capital contribution to the corporation.

Summary

Henry C. Tilford, Jr. , transferred shares of Watco, Inc. , stock to key employees at nominal value to induce them to work for the corporation. The IRS treated these transfers as capital contributions under section 83, disallowing Tilford's claimed capital loss deductions. The Tax Court, however, held that these transfers were sales or exchanges under section 1002, allowing Tilford to claim capital loss deductions. The court invalidated the IRS regulation that treated such transactions as capital contributions, finding it inconsistent with the statute and prior case law. The decision reaffirmed the principle established in Downer v. Commissioner that non-pro-rata stock surrenders to third parties for the corporation's benefit result in recognizable losses to the shareholder.

Facts

Henry C. Tilford, Jr. , was the majority shareholder and chairman of Watco, Inc. , a sign manufacturing company. To induce key employees to work for Watco, Tilford sold them shares of stock at $1 per share. The stock was subject to restrictions, including a right of first refusal for Tilford to repurchase at book value if the employee left or sold the stock within five years. The stock was placed in escrow to enforce these restrictions. Tilford claimed capital loss deductions on his tax returns for these sales. The IRS disallowed these deductions, treating the transfers as capital contributions to Watco under section 83.

Procedural History

Tilford petitioned the Tax Court for a redetermination of the deficiencies asserted by the IRS. The court heard arguments on whether the stock transfers should be treated as sales or capital contributions and whether the IRS regulation under section 83 was valid. The Tax Court issued its opinion on October 20, 1980, ruling in favor of Tilford on the capital loss issue but upholding the IRS's determination regarding farm recapture income.

Issue(s)

1. Whether section 83 denies petitioner a loss on the sale of stock of a corporation, in which he was the majority shareholder, made to employees of the corporation in order to induce them to work for it.
2. Whether respondent correctly determined the excess deductions account for purposes of section 1251.

Holding

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.

1. No, because the court found that the transfers constituted sales or exchanges under section 1002, not capital contributions as treated by the IRS regulation under section 83. The regulation was held invalid as inconsistent with the statute and prior case law.
2. Yes, because the court upheld the IRS's method of computing the excess deductions account under section 1251, rejecting Tilford's arguments for a reduction based on his negative taxable income.

Court's Reasoning

The Tax Court analyzed the case by comparing it to Downer v. Commissioner, where a similar stock transfer was treated as a sale resulting in a capital loss. The court found that section 83 primarily deals with income recognition and does not address deductions for shareholders. The court invalidated the IRS regulation under section 83 that treated shareholder stock transfers to employees as capital contributions, finding it contrary to section 1002 and inconsistent with long-standing case law treating non-pro-rata stock surrenders as sales or exchanges. The court rejected the IRS's "double deduction" argument, viewing the shareholder's loss as a separate transaction from the corporation's deduction for services. The court also noted that upholding the regulation would result in an unjustified deferral of gain or loss recognition. On the second issue, the court upheld the IRS's computation of the excess deductions account under section 1251, finding no basis for the reduction Tilford sought based on his negative taxable income.

Practical Implications

This decision clarifies that a shareholder's transfer of stock to employees in exchange for services should be treated as a sale or exchange, allowing the shareholder to claim a capital loss if the stock's value has declined. Practitioners should be aware that IRS regulations attempting to treat such transfers as capital contributions may be invalidated if they conflict with statutory provisions and established case law. The ruling reaffirms the principle that a shareholder's recognition of gain or loss on stock transfers should not be deferred merely because the transfer benefits the corporation. For similar cases, attorneys should analyze whether the transfer is a closed transaction and whether the stock's value at the time of transfer supports the claimed loss. The decision also highlights the complexities of computing the excess deductions account under section 1251, particularly for subchapter S corporations, and the limited circumstances under which adjustments may be made.

© 2025 SCOTUSreports.com. All rights reserved.