Estate of Helen Longsworth Smith, Metropolitan Bank of Lima, Ohio, Executor, Petitioner v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Respondent, 79 T. C. 974 (1982)

A surviving spouse's interest in a trust qualifies for the marital deduction if it is a life estate with an unlimited power of appointment exercisable alone and in all events.

Summary

In Estate of Smith v. Commissioner, the U. S. Tax Court ruled that a bequest to the decedent's husband qualified for the marital deduction under section 2056(b)(5) of the Internal Revenue Code. The trust allowed the surviving spouse to receive all income and principal upon request, with no limitations, indicating an unlimited power of appointment. The court determined that the husband's power was exercisable alone and in all events, despite a trustee's discretion to distribute during incapacity, which did not conflict with the husband's powers. This case clarifies that a marital deduction can be claimed when the surviving spouse has an unrestricted ability to appoint the trust's assets to themselves or their estate.

Facts

Helen Longsworth Smith died on January 3, 1978, and left a will directing her estate's residue to a trust for her surviving husband, Morris H. Smith. The trust allowed Morris to receive all income and principal upon request, with the trust terminating if all principal was withdrawn. The trust agreement was amended to clarify that Morris should have the entire principal and income without limitations. There were no contingent remaindermen if Morris did not exercise his power. The Commissioner disallowed the marital deduction claimed on the estate tax return, arguing the husband's power of appointment was limited.

Procedural History

The executor of Helen Longsworth Smith's estate filed a petition with the U. S. Tax Court after the Commissioner disallowed the marital deduction on the estate tax return. The Tax Court heard the case and issued its decision on December 2, 1982, ruling in favor of the petitioner and allowing the marital deduction.

interest to himself or his estate, satisfying the requirements of section 2056(b)(5).
2. Yes, because the husband's power was exercisable alone and in all events, despite the trustee's discretion during the husband's incapacity, which did not limit the husband's power.

Court's Reasoning

The court analyzed the trust instrument's language and amendments to determine the decedent's intent. It found that the trust gave the husband an unlimited power of appointment, as evidenced by the provision allowing him to withdraw the entire principal and the absence of any alternate disposition to remaindermen. The court applied Ohio law, which recognizes an unlimited power of appointment when the life tenant can dispose of the property without incurring liability to remaindermen. The court rejected the Commissioner's argument that the trustee's authority to distribute principal upon request limited the husband's power, finding that the trust's overall intent was to give the husband complete control. Additionally, the court held that the trustee's power to distribute during the husband's incapacity did not make his power not exercisable alone and in all events, as it was consistent with the regulations and did not conflict with the husband's power.

Practical Implications

This decision impacts estate planning by clarifying that a marital deduction can be claimed when a surviving spouse has an unlimited power of appointment over trust assets. Estate planners should draft trust instruments to clearly express the intent to give the surviving spouse such power, without limitations or alternate dispositions to remaindermen. The ruling also indicates that a trustee's power to distribute during the spouse's incapacity does not necessarily preclude the marital deduction if it is consistent with the spouse's power. Subsequent cases have followed this reasoning, such as Estate of Clayton v. Commissioner, where a similar trust structure was upheld for the marital deduction. This case serves as a guide for structuring trusts to maximize tax benefits while providing flexibility to the surviving spouse.
